SUGGESTED #SUMMERREADING

Denton Little's Deathdate by Lance Rubin

Ever since he was a kid, Denton Little knew he would die when he was 17—not the precise moment of the day or how, but enough to know he had a deadline by which to accomplish certain goals. That's not that big a deal, though; almost everyone in this near-future tale knows the precise day of his or her death. For the most part, Denton has tried to keep his life fairly normal, but his last day is anything but. As he get closer to midnight on his deathdate, he learns beguiling secrets about his past, particularly regarding his mother, whose deathdate was the same day he was born.

Simon vs. the Homo Sapiens Agenda by Becky Albertalli

After a "goobery nerd" named Martin discovers Georgia teen Simon Spier's secret email relationship with a boy who calls himself "Blue," Martin blackmails Simon into helping him romance Abby, a new girl who has been welcomed into Simon's lunchroom clique. The threat of being outed by Martin forces Simon to come to terms with his sexuality, and his wise insights—Why do only gay people have to come out? Why is that the default?—add heft to a plot that is both hilarious and heartbreaking.

The Tyrant's Daughter by J. C. Carleson

Fifteen-year-old Laila grew up believing she was a princess and that her younger brother, Bastien, was heir to the throne. After her father's assassination, however, when her family flees to the United States, she learns that the world views her father as a cruel dictator. Laila suffers culture shock in a suburb of Washington, D. C., not knowing whether she can trust her friendly American classmates or if she should befriend fellow refugees resentful of her father's power.

Noggin by John Corey Whaley

Like baseball great Ted Williams, Travis Coates has his head surgically removed and cryogenically frozen after he dies of leukemia at age 16. Unlike Williams, five years after his death, technological advances allow doctors to attach Travis' head to a donor body that's taller and more muscular than the original. Travis awakens to restart where he left off—sophomore year—but everyone he knew has moved on. Best friend Kyle is struggling through college; former girlfriend Cate is engaged to someone else. As only the second cryogenics patient successfully revived, Travis is in uncharted territory; he's "over" high school, but not ready to be anywhere else.
